Excerpt: .Good teachers in this day have learned the use of the blackboard. They do not attempt to get along without one for a single recitation. They have learned its use in centralizing attention, in bringing the lesson to the eye as well as the ear, thus doubling the chance of the mind s grasp. The outline presents a connected view of a subject, showing how one principle grows out of another, how definitions and rules are derived, which pleases and impresses the pupils as nothing else will. The close investigation and observation necessary to the preparation of a lesson in the form of a written outline, is a most excellent drill for these powers. Have your pupils place their outlines on the board from day to day, and the comparisons and mutual criticisms they call out, will awaken an interest, and order and arrangement present themselves in connection with every subject in a most forceful manner. Such has been our experience. And such are the benefits arising from study and recitations by outlines, that we do not see how their use can be dispensed with in any school. THE ultimate aim of teaching, in the public schools, is to give the pupils a good method for learning more, so that when they are ready to leave school, they are able to continue their studies and act for themselves. To inculcate this method of learning, the teacher must strive to lead the pupils to do the thinking,...
