The main supply of commercial potash comes from the mines of Germany, where it exists in practically unlimited quantity. It is marketed in the crude form under the name of kainit, and in the more concentrated forms, the muriate and the sulphate. Kainit, containing 10 per cent, actual potash, is rather slow in its action. Where stable manure is made and it is possible to obtain kainit, a quantity (about one pound for each animal kept) may with profit be daily sprinkled about the stalls and swept with the manure into the pit. It serves to fix the nitrogen and prevent its loss...
