Brand New Book  Print on Demand .Excerpt from Papers From the Tortugas Laboratory of the Carnegie Institution of Washington, Vol. 5 George Harold Drew, only son of George Drew, of Devonshire, England, was born on October 23, 1881, and died suddenly on January 29, 1913. From early boyhood chemistry and microscopy fascinated him, and while yet a child he studied in a doused stable on his father's place, which was made to serve as a rough laboratory. Until the age of ten he was taught by his mother, and then he was sent to New College, Eastbourne, Sussex. Being deeply interested in the scientific side of medicine, he entered Cambridge University, where he became a scholar of Christ's College, and gained the distinctions of Exhibitioner, Foundation Scholar, and Prizeman, afterwards becoming Schreiner University Scholar, and a student at Exeter Hospital. During his five years at Cambridge he took the entire medical course, but afterwards decided to devote his life to research, inclination leading him to choose the scientific side of his profession rather than to engage in its active practice. After leaving Cambridge, he served for a year as University Scholar of St. Mary's Hospital, London, and subsequently, after working for a short time at the Port Erin Marine Laboratory, he went to Plymouth and associated himself with the Marine Biological Laboratory, wherein most of his scientific work was accomplished. He was one of those chosen by Captain Scott to serve upon the scientific staff of the British Antarctic Expedition, but he declined the honor, preferring not to break the continuity of his studies at Plymouth. From 1910 until 1912 he held a Beit Memorial Fellowship for Medical Research in cancer;...
