 Flimflam has lived. The glorious girl is dead
 The florist and the keeper of the hearse
 Have shrined her sleep and garlanded her head
 For her last function. Be none heard to curse.
 But the torch-bearing maker of the verse,
 Extol the passing ship, once fraught with sweets,
 That with sweet-giving earth must now commerce
 And bear their viewless tides with ghostly fleets.
 Pale friend, surviving friendship recollects
 The warmth which your unanswering hand rejects,
 Your smile's caprice, the satire in your eye,
 Your instant pout, the feminine effects,
 Your tiny voice, from which the wit would fly,
 And love that rued till you forsook the day,
 Stopped your heart's music and in silence lay.
 No more, in life's propinquity found equal,
 Shall we explain the world which gave us place;
 Yet shall these margins frame no weeping sequel
 Unto a friendship greater than love's grace.
 Content to die, she turned her lessening face
 From the rant laughers of the fools' emprise;
 Had laughed with them, and when...
